What About That Mosque?

I confess that I am asked that question frequently by parishioners and non-parishioners alike. Of course I am referring to the mosque that has been proposed near Ground Zero in New York City.

There are arguments for allowing the mosque/center rooted in religious liberty and freedom (a position in principle favored by most Catholic leaders) and there are those against who are uncomfortable in that the 9/11 terrorists were motivated by a radicalized interpretation of Islam. There is, of course, a wide array of emotions, thoughts, laws and precedents that all collide in this situation. (To be honest I am very uncomfortable with the State Department funding an imam's fifteen-day trip to the Middle East to promote "religious tolerance" with taxpayer funds ironically being sent to countries that do not allow Catholics/Christians the respect and freedom of public worship in their lands. One might think the State Department should instead fund Christian leaders to go promote inter-religious dialogue with Muslim nations to allow for real, genuine religious freedom!)

So, what about the mosque and its location? I would say that an article by William McGurn in the Wall Street Journal in August seemed to make the most sense. He pointed to the situation some years ago in Auschwitz where a convent of contemplative nuns was located just outside the concentration camp in Poland after the war. The Jewish people were upset at the convent's location (even though Catholics were also put to death in the camps with others). Pope John Paul II intervened with a steady mind and heart and asked the sisters to re-locate away from the camp but to continue their prayer of reparation. The nuns had every legal right to be there but Pope John Paul II thought it was the sensitive and right thing to do even though it wasn't required. I was thinking of writing to those nuns (who continue to pray for the victims of the Holocaust and their killers), asking them to pray that the hearts and minds of those planning to build the mosque respect the sensitivity of its location, and move it further away not because they have to but because they ought to.

Let us pray for all Americans of all faiths on this anniversary week of 9/11 and pray for our good soldiers in harm's way. May they be able to practice their faith wherever they serve.

Blessings,

Fr Taillon
